BY JOHN J. PLATE. What homes are waiting now
With doors alar and opening bearts and smlis Of firelit quiet tonching lip and brow For these, far ne the while!

Heralds have gone before-Letters, that link the broken chale of Home Over Time's waves, whispering into the door; The threshold knows they come!

With some, perchance, the years Have traveled with their faces, that, to-night, Return (oh not from change and time and tears!) Where flamed their morning tight. And some but yesterday

Kissed parties lips and emiling dared to part. Trusting to marrow, with his morning ray
To light the meeting heart,

Others we now oran Of treffic drew w the husy fast from home. All wings of purpose finites on the train. That make the world to roam!

But who is he? What door
Is open now for him? What mother stends
To steal her boy to home's warm heart once m
From the world's desert ands?

I wish to advise the freexperienced rot to plant willows near wherethey expect to lay drains, nor to lay drains near villow trees notil after the letter are killed. I have had two drains of three-lich tille entirely stoped by willow roots; one in two sommers, and the other he shoult two and a belf. One of them (which was leid three feet deep), were due to the first of the different stoped, this last spring. About twenty of the tile, upposite a willow, was entirely filled with fibrons roots, metted together, and holding a little sand. As soon as these we at taken cat, the water came from the drain above in a stream as large as the tile would boid, and continued turning to for several weeks, until it begen to feil on eccount of dryer weether. It is a normal termine of cur joerns, by request of a lady subscribes:
